

Kazakhstan's elections offered increased choice but limitations on participation remain: observers

The 19 March early parliamentary elections were held in the context of reforms introduced to bring Kazakhstan closer to holding elections in line with international standards and OSCE commitments, as legal amendments addressed several previous recommendations and provided increased choice for voters, international observers said in a statement released Monday. However, limits on the exercise of fundamental freedoms remain, and some political groups continued to be prevented from participation as parties in elections. Observers urged further changes to the legal framework to provide a sufficient basis for conducting democratic elections.

"Democracy is a process that requires constant attention and dedication. We have noted some welcome improvements, including related to election laws, but Kazakhstan will only achieve the stated political goal of democratic development if far reaching reforms continue," said OSCE PA Vice-President Irene Charalambides (Cyprus), OSCE Special Co-ordinator and leader of the short-term observers. "In particular, greater attention to protecting everyone's fundamental freedoms is needed."

OSCE PA Vice-President and head of the PA's delegation of observers Reinhold Lopatka (Austria) said: "The increased competition, particularly with self-nominated candidates, is a significant development. However, legal and practical hurdles continue to detract from a fully open race among equals. In the future, the publication of results for each polling station will be important for improved transparency and public confidence."

nificant procedural irregularities were observed during counting and tabulation and important safeguards were often disregarded, undermining the transparency of the process. Women remain underrepresented, observers noted, and measures to promote women's participation in public and political life are limited.

Some 80 observers from the OSCE PA participated in the election observation mission, deploying in Astana and surroundings, Almaty, Aktau, and Shymkent. From the International Secretariat, they were supported by Andreas Baker, Farimah Daftary, Stéphanie Koltchanov, Anastasiya Griadsova, Anzhelika Ivanishcheva, Michaela Stranska, Manuchekhr Salokhudinov, and Iryna Sabashuk. The PA worked closely with observers and experts from the OSCE/ODIHR, led by Eoghan Murphy (Ireland), resulting in 404 observers from 42 countries deployed by the OSCE on election day.
