Elections in Belarus did not meet important international standards, observers say

"These elections have demonstrated an overall lack of respect for democratic commitments," said Margareta Cederfelt, Special Co-ordinator and leader of the OSCE short-term observer mission. "In a country in which the power and independence of parliament is limited and fundamental Freedoms are restricted for both voters and candidates, parliamentary elections are in danger of becoming a formality."

"Elections without freedom for debate and genuine participation, as we saw here in Belarus, are not the opportunity for the public that elections should be," said Ditmir Bushati, Head of the OSCE PA delegation. "Political actors were simply not working on a level playing field here, resulting in what were effectively non-competitive elections."

The CEC carried out an extensive information campaign, and took steps to make voting accessible for people with disabilities. At the same time, the domination of election commissions by the state limited their impartiality and independence, potentially undermining public confidence in the election process.

The 69-member delegation from the OSCE PA deployed to several areas of Belarus for election day observation, including Lahojsk, Niasviz, Stowbtsy, Baranovichi, Mogilev, Brest, Gomel, Grodna, and Viciebsk. The PA worked closely with the OSCE/ODIHR, led by Corien Jonker, and PACE, led by Lord Blencathra.
