In meetings, Guliyevev touched upon the latest developments in the Western Balkans, including prospects for European integration, upcoming elections, and regional co-operation. Discussions highlighted future regional prospects also in light of the successful resolution of the name dispute between Athens and Skopje.

Guliyevev also stressed the invaluable contributions of the Greek Delegation in the Migration Committee and in the context of election observation activities. He noted that the Ad Hoc Committee on Migration has been closely following migration challenges faced by Greece as a frontline country on the eastern Mediterranean route, and highlighted the challenges associated with an equitable distribution of asylum seekers, repatriation and the threat related to foreign terrorist fighters in the region.

Other topics discussed included institution building, the strengthening of the rule of law in the region and the challenges which the pandemic impresses on freedom of the media. The visit, Guliyevev's first to the region since being appointed Special Representative last summer, took place 22-24 November.
